

My name is Balázs Forman. For 26 years, I taught at the Departments of Economic Geography of the Corvinus University of Budapest. My main teaching and research areas were in the border areas of geography and economics: economics and geography of natural resources and climate change; regional economics and politics; economics of globalization and modernization, energy management; economic and regional geography; European Union institutions and common policies. I taught as a visiting professor for 13 years at Babes-Bolyai University in Romania in Satu Mare and Cluj-Napoca. I also taught for several years in Miercurea Ciuc and Komarno.

I wrote 3 monographs on the regional policy of the European Union. I wrote 30 book chapters on the economics of natural resources, energy management, regional science, financial geography. Several of my new books are currently being published. I have been teaching at John von Neumann University since 2021. So far, my main task here has been the planning, accreditation and launch of the master's program in Regional and Environmental Economics.

I am the Hungarian ambassador of the Regional Studies Association (RSA). I am also an active member of the Association of American Geography (AAG) and the Regional Science Association International (RSAI). I participated in the AAG conference 8 times. I have attended the RSA and IGU conferences on several occasions.
